invention will be set forth in two parts. 1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to insulatormounted electrodes of the type used in semiconductor device processing. 2. Description of the Prior Art Electrodes for use in plasma etching and reactive ion etching are typically made of tungsten. The tungsten material is used because of the ability to plate or vapor-deposit tungsten on electrodes on semiconductor wafers, and thereafter, to sputter the tungsten off the wafers in a reactive ion etching step. The tungsten is preferably deposited at temperatures which cause minimal distortion or degradation of the underlying layers on the wafer. This is because of the fact that the semiconductor layers beneath the electrodes on which the tungsten is plated, are typically polysilicon. A problem in the past has been that the tungsten does not adhere well to the underlying polysilicon. This problem can be exacerbated by the presence of oxide layers beneath the electrodes because such oxide layers tend to be porous. The tungsten tends to wedge itself through the pores of the oxide, and the tungsten will not adhere at the pores. Efforts have been made to bond the tungsten to the underlying polysilicon without success.

Typical efforts to provide adhesion between the tungsten and the underlying polysilicon have involved introducing a layer of a nonconducting material between the tungsten and the polysilicon. This is an effort to isolate the polysilicon surface from the tungsten, but at the same time, any electrical conductivity between the polysilicon surface and the tungsten is lost. Another approach to making the adhesion of the tungsten better is to roughen the polysilicon surface. However, the roughness of the polysilicon surface produced by the prior art methods has been insufficient to provide the desired degree of adhesion between the tungsten and the polysilicon. It is therefore an object of the invention to provide an electrode and a method of making the electrode which results in the formation of a good bond between the tungsten and the underlying polysilicon. Another object of the invention is to provide an electrode and a method of making the electrode which
