Loss-of-function mutations within the multidrug-resistance 1 (Pfmdr1) and plasmodial lactate dehydrogenase (pLDH) genes in the artemisinin (ART) therapy of malaria have been associated with resistance to ART. We have investigated the molecular basis for the reduced susceptibility of chloroquine (CQ)-resistant Plasmodium falciparum to ART. K10 (the most highly resistant CQ strain of P. falciparum) expressed the Pfmdr1 and pLDH alleles of the chloroquine-sensitive W2 strain in a chloroquine-resistant background. Parasites carried non-synonymous mutations within the Pfmdr1 (M51L, T76A and Y184F) or pLDH (G188E) genes. Independent transfections of expression constructs containing non-synonymous mutations into the chloroquine-sensitive Dd2 or CQ-resistant 3D7 strain to introduce the respective mutations into a chloroquine-sensitive background strain showed that T76A, M51L and Y184F reduced susceptibility to ART (measured as parasite growth inhibition and 50% inhibitory concentration against 3H-hypoxanthine incorporation) and abolished ART resistance when carried in the chloroquine-resistant 3D7 strain background. By contrast, G188E did not. Parasites generated by transfection of the K10 alleles into the chloroquine-sensitive 3D7 strain were significantly less sensitive to
