Check out what .DESCRIPTION: (Applicant's Abstract) Methotrexate (MTX), a folate antagonist, is used extensively to treat a variety of malignancies. Despite this, its clinical development has been retarded by its rapid in vivo clearance, adverse side effects and the development of resistance to its antitumor effects. In the proposed studies, the investigators aim to develop and evaluate alternative chemotherapeutic drugs that work via a novel and previously unrecognized mechanism of action. One such group of compounds are those which are hydroxylated at the 12-position of MTX and which are part of a new class of folate agonists known as the antifolates. In vivo, these compounds have been shown to have antitumor activity in mice. The proposed studies aim to isolate and elucidate a structure-activity relationship for the antifolate compounds, emphasizing their in vivo efficacy in preclinical tumor models. Folic acid and the antifolates will be synthesized in vitro and tested in cell culture for their ability to bind to and inhibit dihydrofolate reductase (DHFR) and the pteridine reductase (PTR) enzymes. These studies will be combined with studies to evaluate their cytotoxic effects on a panel of human tumor lines and to determine their in vivo antitumor efficacy on transplantable tumors in mice. Interference with MTX metabolism in tumor cells by using the non-toxic antifolate analogues as inhibitors of MTX metabolism will be investigated. Chemoprot
