[More Information: License: ----- QQ International is a free software available at Uploader: Xu Ye System Requirement: ----- OS: Win7/Vista RAM: 1GB Spatially variable size-structured experimental models of aging are a key component of research in the field of theoretical gerontology (for an overview see: [B13]). Models have been used to test the robustness of aging models across populations with varying degrees of genetic and demographic diversity ([B9]). Yet, the use of these models has largely been restricted to the laboratory setting. In this issue, [B14] present an analysis of a natural population of the stalk-eyed fly, Diplolaena punctipennis, which has been studied intensively over the past decade. Their study combines field and laboratory data obtained from a well-studied population in Southern California, USA. Using data on the number of eggs laid per female, hatch rate, life span, and population growth rate over a 2-year period, [B14] provided evidence that the experimentally imposed size selection, by reducing the maximum size of females, generates a non-monotonic trajectory. The maximum size of females was constant in their study, with larger females being at a selective disadvantage compared to smaller females. Surprisingly, [B14] found that size selection results in the evolution of increased reproduction rates and hatching rates, as well as increased longevity and increased population growth rates, yet reduced mean size. Size selection may be affecting more than just the mean size of the population. Following [B2], population size in a particular environment is determined by both intrinsic (e.g., life history and demography) and extrinsic (e.g., resource availability) factors. Size selection can affect the mean size of the population by altering intrinsic factors (e.g., increasing the proportion of larger females). Moreover, the mean size of the population (or other fitness components) can be affected by size selection even if the mean
