- Photoshop's Filters: This area contains special filters to alter the colors, patterns, and other properties of the image. *

Q: Getting touch events from the background activity of my application I have a application in which I need to get touch events from the background. So, I am embedding my activity into a service and when my activity becomes the foreground, I can access the view `v` with `getWindow()`. This works fine. The problem is that I need to handle the touch events in my activity when it's not the foreground activity, i.e. when my activity is suspended and when the user resumes. I tried handling the touch events in `onCreate()` but when the user brings my activity foreground, I lose the events. Any ideas? Thank you, A: This was very easy to do and may be helpful to others. Basically, you have to register the touch handler everytime you get a callback of onResume(), which you do automatically when your activity is activated. And you simply unregister the touch handler every time you get a callback of onPause(). Cheers!

Legislation Making Its Way Through State Senate Explores Whether Employees Of Public Works May Be Attacked Susan M. Davis of The Baltimore Sun Lawmakers are weighing legislation this session that would require public works employees to use personal firearms when they respond to incidents in which police officers are dispatched. But the bill faces opposition from the Police Union, which is pushing for a change in state law in the face of a Federal Bureau of Investigation crackdown on illegal gambling. Sen. C. Anthony Muse, the Democratic senator from Charles County who introduced the Senate version of the public works firearms bill, said he found it "odd that there is almost no mention of police officers, which is why I referred to it as a public works bill." "I really believe you should be able to protect your own life," said Muse, adding that the legislation was aimed at preventing innocent people from being killed by accidents involving public works employees. The Senate version, with an amendment, would require public works employees who are called to emergencies involving individuals with mental illness or intoxication to draw and discharge their firearms, unless police officers are on the scene. Muse, a Baltimore County Democratic commissioner, said the bill was also meant to protect the lives of public works employees who are called to perform services during a riot. Employees of public works agencies like the Department of Transportation and others also would be required to carry firearms. Muse said the legislation, the first public works firearms bill
