In the prior art, the development of electrostatic latent images has been carried out in many well known ways, typically utilizing a developer which includes a mixture of carrier particles having insulating properties and toner particles that are electrostatically charged. In such systems, it is conventional to cascade the developer material, generally in the form of a magnetic brush, to the electrostatic latent image. When the image is developed, in the area where a drop or trace of developer material is placed, the potential of the image is lowered, which causes the toner to be electrostatically attracted thereto. Thus, the electrostatic latent image is translated into a visible image and can be deposited on a suitable substrate
