Autodesk 3D.Point-of-care-oriented ultrasound-guided vascular access placement in emergency medicine: a point-of-care-oriented

tip. Venous cannulation is often performed with ultrasound guidance, but experience is limited in emergency care. The aim of this study was to evaluate the ability of emergency physicians to place vascular catheters using a point-of-care (POC)-oriented ultrasound technique. The study was performed at a teaching hospital. All emergency physicians were instructed to use a POC-oriented ultrasound technique and place central venous catheters in a simulated bleeding patient with a difficult anatomy. After the procedure, the physicians assessed the technical success (insertion of a central venous catheter at the puncture site), success (presence of contrast in the vein), and complications (pneumothorax, hemothorax). The technical success was obtained in 95% (95/100) of the cases and was not affected by sex, age, level of medical training, or the duration of emergency medicine experience. The success rate was 97% (95/97) in patients with an easy anatomy, 90% (10/11) in patients with 0cc13bf012
